Business Development General inquiry Email address optional A message is required Message required. It has sat around since then and I decided I would like to try and use it yesterday. I plugged it in and the motor just hummed so something was binding up. I took it apart and cleaned it up and it still was bound up. If I pull up on the bottom blade holder it will take off, so maybe it just needs to have a blade in it to fire up. Im going to be getting a router from menards today so maybe I will just pick up one of the cheaper scroll saws they have. They had a wen on clearance for 90 bucks or a masterforce for I think 150didnt really look at it that much. Didnt really want to buy a new one if I can get the old one working decent since I dont really use it that much. Any reviews on the masterforce or wen, I know they are both cheap saws but for occasional use are either of them decent Menards had it on clearance for 85 bucks, down from 120. Right next to it is a performax that is identical besides the colors and its normal price is 85 bucks. It was a horse a piece but hopefully its not a total piece of crap.Is that what the manual says it takes.

Have you measured the distance between the top and bottom blade retainers with the tension on. Also, I would say that your problem with the saw not running could be related to the fact that there is no blade in the saw.Im not sure exactly how old it is but I think it was still made in the US so Im guessing maybe 80s by the looks of it. It has a spot on the side of it to put a sanding disk. I think its more of a hobby saw, its all stamped steel. I will order a few blades for it and hopefully the tension from the blades will unbind things and work. Here is a picture I found online similar to mine. I tried out the wen and for a cheapo saw it seems to do alright. The dust blower and led light are nice and its a lot heavier than the dremel. Well see how things go. Kenbo, or anyone else, can you tell me a little about variable speed on the scroll saw. I dont have a clue what speed to use for what! ThanksThanks for the education. Now, on to the variable speeds. The speed control, at this stage in the game, is strictly for your comfort. If you are comfortable with the control you have on full speed, by all means, let her rip. If you are having some issues with control, you may want to slow the saw down until you get better with control. Run the saw at whatever speed is comfortable for you. If you are going to get into things like cutting metal, acrylic, corian etc, speed plays more of a factor then. Cutting materials that are sensative to heat, will warrant a slower cutting speed. For now though, unless you are getting into the specialty cuttings, work at the speed that suits your comfort zone. KenThe package says they are for a model 571 and 572. I once taught an elementary school shop class and we used the Dremels because its very difficult to get hurt using them.Just looking to cut some shapes in wood and maybe some 5x3 ovals out of the center of the piece for a picture frame type thing. So I will play around with the speed to where I feel comfortable.
