Infertility is a global health issue, affecting over 10% of women worldwide [1,2]. Infertility has psychological, medical and economic implications, resulting in trauma and stress in couples requiring IVF [3,4]. Many causes of infertility, in both women and men, have to be taken into account, ranging from daily habits, environmental factors, infections, hormonal, genetic and anatomical pathologies [5,6]. Assisted reproductive technologies (ARTs) are commonly used globally with several forms of interventions, which are ever more advanced and attempt to address the challenges linked to the broad spectrum of infertility in humans. Treatments include in vitro handling of human oocytes, spermatozoa, embryos and donors' gametes or embryos [7–11]. For a pregnancy to occur, endocrinological changes during the luteal phase need to be synchronised with endometrial maturation. The period when the endometrium can receive the embryo is called the window of implantation. Its individualisation is crucial to improving pregnancy rates.

Endogenous luteal phase support is impaired in IVF cycles and exogenous supplementation is mandatory [12–14]. After the ovulation trigger with hCG, a supraphysiological and rapid rise in progesterone occurs four days after oocyte retrieval and falls on the sixth day after oocyte pickup, just before the opening of the implantation window. After the GnRH agonist trigger, progesterone growth reaches an almost physiological concentration, but a complete and irreversible luteolysis takes place within five days [15].

Studies conducted on the luteal phase support after GnRH antagonist trigger help us to comprehend the central role of serum progesterone concentration in the luteal phase and its importance on the implantation window and the reproductive outcome: a very low level of mid-luteal serum progesterone (OPU + 7 days) [16] is related to a very high percentage of pregnancy losses (79%). In the following studies, the authors attempt to prove that, by adding low doses of hCG, corpora lutea are recovered [17,18]. An increase in serum progesterone improves clinical pregnancy rates (CPR) and reduces pregnancy loss rates.

In the case, where luteal serum progesterone could predict pregnancy, as Thomsen et al. [19] reported in a prospective study of 602 IVF/ICSI cycles: 40% of patients had a reduced probability of a positive reproductive outcome below and above a mid-luteal serum progesterone of 150–250 nmol/L (47–79 ng/mL).

Similarly, low serum progesterone levels (<8.8 ng/mL) on the day of embryo transfer in the frozen artificial cycles have been related to a negative impact on pregnancy outcomes when using micronized vaginal progesterone, in both the donated egg and the subject's oocytes [20,21]. In a retrospective study, Kofinas et al. [22] find comparable results, supplementing the luteal phase utilising intramuscular progesterone: progesterone level on the ET day below 20 ng/dL may cause a significantly lower ongoing pregnancy rate (OPR) and live birth rate (LBR). There is also a significant decrease in OPR and LBR when progesterone crosses the 40 ng/mL.

The role of luteal progesterone during the implantation period is important, but we still do not know the exact mechanism of its action. To better understand the concept, two different studies are relevant. Young et al. [23] have focused their attention on secretory endometrial histology and endometrial gene expression in patients who received different doses of intramuscular progesterone (2.5, 5, 10 or 40 mg) over a period of 10 days, compared to ovulatory control patients. Serum progesterone is also measured at its peak (2–3 h after injection) and trough (1–2 h before injection) on two separate occasions between 3 and 10 days of progesterone treatment: only patients with higher serum progesterone level (belonging to the 40 mg group) express an endometrial dating, comparable to natural cycle control women, while adequate histology is seen in all groups, except for those with lower progesterone (2.5 mg). These findings support the hypothesis that serum progesterone is the best marker of endometrial receptivity. Whether this receptivity is gained due to a direct effect on endometrium or systemically, is the subject of a recent study [24]: 79 patients underwent endometrial preparation with valerate oestradiol from day 1 or 2 and vaginal progesterone when endometrium reaches a thickness of 6.5 mm. After five days of progesterone supplementation, a blood sample and an endometrial biopsy are collected. Measurements include serum progesterone, ERA test for the evaluation of endometrial receptivity and endometrial progesterone, with 17 hy-is also not to be confused with interaction as the addition of effects. Interaction is a statistical term for the presence of a statistically significant interaction term in a regression model. Effect modification is a statistical term for the presence of a statistically significant interaction term in a regression model.

The paper is organized as follows. Section 2 presents the definitions of interaction and effect modification. Section 3 presents the definitions of interaction and effect modification. Section 4 presents the definitions of interaction and effect modification. Section 5 presents the definitions of interaction and effect modification. Section 6 presents the definitions of interaction and effect modification.

Throughout the paper, several examples are given to illustrate the distinction between interaction and effect modification. L'AUTORITE PARENTALE

1. Qu'est-ce que l'autorité parentale ?

- L'autorité parentale est un ensemble de droits et de devoirs conférés aux père et mère pour assurer l'éducation de leur enfant mineur. C'est une fonction exercée dans un but de protection de l'enfant.

L'article 371-1 du code civil dispose :

« l'autorité parentale est un ensemble de droits et de devoirs ayant pour finalité l'intérêt de l'enfant.

Elle appartient aux père et mère jusqu'à la majorité ou l'émancipation de l'enfant pour le protéger dans sa sécurité, sa santé, sa moralité, pour assurer son éducation et permettre son développement, dans le respect dû à sa personne.

Les parents associent l'enfant aux décisions qui le concernent, selon son âge et son degré de maturité. »
